Dear Officer:

I oppose taxpayer-funded research on human-animal hybrids.

There are many possible ethical violations at different levels.

Chimeras can potentially have human brains or human sperms/eggs that can result in human offspring even with all the necessary safety precautions. To what extent can an animal have human genes and still considered just an animal?

Human-animal hybrids are violation of human dignity, violation of the order of nature, violation of the dignity of the humanized animal and moral confusion. In addition, the majority of Americans oppose gene editing. It is clearly wrong to use the American's taxpayer money to fund the very research that we oppose.
